The heightening of globalization drove a few authors to recommend that states were not, at this point applicable to worldwide legislative issues. This view has been liable to discuss:

Then again, different pundits have been contending that states have stayed vital for worldwide governmental issues. They have worked with globalizing cycles and activities; not been obscured by them. They have been revived in light of the fact that, among different reasons, they are as yet the essential suppliers of (military) security in the worldwide field; they are as yet the vital loci for articulating the voices of (procedurally equitable) public networks, and for requesting their communications with comparable countries; lastly, they are crucial to relations of (inconsistent) monetary trade to the extent that they legitimize and uphold the worldwide lawful systems that empower globalization in any case.
